"EDUCATIONAL" FILM AND MARCEL MARCEAU NEXT IN VIEW

"The Belles of St. Trinian" are the female objects depicted in Ronald Searle's well-known cartoons on the subject of Regressive Education in Britain. St. Trinian's, on the screen as in the scribbles, is a finishing school with a difference: it is not the students but the teachers who get finished. The school motto is In Flagranti Delicto. The curriculum offers a wide selection of illiberal arts and quite a few handy crafts. In chemistry, for instance, some of the younger girls make a still. Its product is properly bottled, labeled ("St. Trinian's Gin") and distributed by a local bootlegger (George Cole) who is also on the payroll as the school bookmaker and general spiv. Nitro-glycerin is also concocted, but not often used. Arson is discouraged unless the school buildings that are burned happen also to be insured.

At hockey the St. Trinian's girls literally wipe up the field with their opponents, and yet the indoor sports--dropping a battle-axe on an unwary master, stretching an informer on a homemade rack--are more popular. The teaching staff, like the student body, has been formed on St. Trinian's law: survival of the misfittest. The head-mistress herself, a sport of middle-aged Wedgwood sylph with a shifty eye and just the faintest mustache (the part is played by Alastair Sim), is not above "borrowing" her pupils' pocket money, and the rest of the staff is best known by the faculty room it keeps. "It smells," a visitor remarks, "like a powder room in Port Said."

Starring Alastair Sim, Joyce Grenfell and George Cole.

Also on the program will be a short color film presenting three pantomines performed by Marcel Marceau.

June 4, Monday Evening at 8:30, Lecture Hall. Admission 50 cents.
